

Doppelganger (Harbour Bay Book 4)

A new killer has descended on Harbour Bay, and he's already killed five women. Bestselling author Megan Bailey is devastated when her young cousin Stacey goes missing. She's been watching the news and knows what this might mean. Stacey could be the newest victim of Harbour Bay's newest serial killer. Megan is determined to do something, and enlists the help of her friend, the superintendent of police, Amelia Donovan. Amelia has her best detective on the case, Dean Matthews. Dean doesn't believe in love. It makes men weak and vulnerable, and as a retired soldier, he's experienced enough heartache to last several lifetimes. He also has difficulty dealing with emotional women. So when he shows up to interview Megan at the request of his boss, he isn't exactly looking forward to it. Except Megan isn't what he expected. Megan is intelligent, witty, and not to mention, beautiful. Dean tries to maintain a professional distance, but with a killer on the loose, he breaks all his rules and gets involved. He offers Megan comfort and promises he might not be able to keep. The body count continues to rise and Dean's leads are empty as ever. When Megan disappears too, Dean knows his time to solve this case is up. He must unravel the twisted web of clues the killer has left behind or risk the one woman who might finally teach him to love again.
